Cancer is the second leading cause of death in New York State

The Burden of Cancer in New York State

More than 120,000 New Yorkers of all ages are diagnosed with cancer each year, making cancer one of the most significant health challenges facing our state.

Cancer continues to be a leading cause of premature death, despite steady improvements in prevention, screening, treatment, and survival.

Hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers are living with a history of cancer, reflecting advances in early detection and treatment while increasing the need for survivorship and supportive care services.

Many cancers are preventable or can be detected early, highlighting the opportunity to reduce the burden of cancer through coordinated action.

The Burden of Cancer in New York State

The burden of cancer is not shared equally. Differences in cancer risk, screening, stage at diagnosis, treatment, survival, and mortality persist across population groups, geographic regions, and communities facing socioeconomic barriers.

No single organization can address this burden alone. Improving cancer outcomes requires coordinated action among public health, healthcare, researchers, community organizations, advocates, policymakers, and New Yorkers themselves.
